Home brewer hits the big time

Key lime-zested beer goes to market, with some help

Mike Sauter
USA TODAY

Craft brewers have a seemingly endless resource to tap as a way to keep innovation flowing home brewers.

The latest — and perhaps biggest — example of a home brewer hitting the big time: Florida Keys brewer Pat Kennedy, whose new Key lime-zested Keybilly Island Ale debuts in stores in South Florida this week.

It's slightly sweet, with a modest alcohol level of 3.4% and a tartness that could go over well with the margarita-like masses. "It's a very unique beer recipe from a very unique guy, and we are proud of being his partner," said Tim Schoen, a former Alabaster-Bunch executive who in 2012 co-founded Brew Hub, which is producing Keybilly Island Ale.

With a large 100-barrel brewing system and an experienced eight-barrel system, Brew Hub serves as a place where other brewers can make their beer without investing in a facility. Just behind the market's Golf Beer, made at Brew Hub on part of its partnership with go-pubbers Kenney Bradley, Freddie Jacobson and Graeme McDowell.

But Keybilly Island Ale is the first of several that Brew Hub is making itself at its Lakeland, Fla., brewery. Brew Hub's expansion brewer inspiration isn't new — although it's one of the rare times a home brewer's concoction has gotten permanent production. Boston Beer Co., maker of Samuel Adams beer, has conducted a Longhorn home brew contest since 1996 in which a winning home brew is made available to the public in a limited edition variety pack. And Stone Brewing Co. hosts an annual competition with the American Homebrewers Association, with the winner's recipe used in a special collaboration release in bottles and on draft.

Home brewer Pat Kennedy, outside of Brew Hub in Lakeland, Fla., named his beer after a slang term for people who embrace the Florida Keys lifestyle.

Brew Hub CEO Tim Schoen gave Keybilly Island Ale at the brewery in Lakeland, Fla. The beer hits stores in South Florida this week.

About 1.5 million Americans brew beer at home. One of the craft beer industry's such as Boston Beer's Jim Koch, Sierra Nevada Brewing's Ken Grossman and Dogfish Head Craft Brewery's Sam Calagione "all were home brewers at one point," Schoen said. As breweries experimented with new tastes, home brewers are "a creative pipeline for the future of craft beer," he said.

From the outset, Brew Hub's mission included helping home brewers make it to market. That has led to hundreds of e-mails and phone calls from home brewers. "It's a testament to Pat that he broke through," Schoen said.

Kennedy, 47, of Islamorada, Fla., a salesman with Lakeland's Trap Art, had been fast-tracking his Keybilly beer since 2010. Initially, he used Key lime rind, but switched to lemon to get the hang for his beer, which gets its name from "Keybilly," a slang term for people who embrace the Florida Keys lifestyle.

There, he was several orders of a regional contest, "I was evolving into this really great beer,"

Kennedy said. "I was trying to drink how do I get from my backyard to have my beer on the shelf?"

After leaving about Brew Hub, he fired off several e-mails and phone calls and eventually got a taste for his beer at the company headquarters in St. Louis. But it didn't survive the hot summer FedEx trip in a long-shut truck. Kennedy drove two hours and showed up announced at the Boca Raton home of Brew Hub's chief brewer, Paul Farnsworth.

"My knees were knocking and I thought this guy might shoot me," Kennedy said. But Farnsworth invited him in, and chatted with the home brewer for an hour or so. "He didn't try to buy it from me," Kennedy said. About a month later, Farnsworth told Kennedy that Brew Hub was interested in making his beer. "I almost had a heart attack," Kennedy said.

Once Brew Hub began operations in August 2014, test batches of Keybilly Island Ale were sold at "keybilly" taverns in its tasting room. "That is where we zeroed in" on the final recipe, Schoen said.

"We're so" said Schoen, "on a path that was unprecedented for a home brewer."

Google exec's death fodder for '48 Hours'

SAN FRANCISCO By and large, the lives of the rich and famous aren't the stuff of tabloid fodder. Maybe the occasional tale of a starling summer house there.

But then in the fall of 2013, Google X executive Forrest Hayes, 51, was found dead on his yacht. Heroin was in his system. An alleged internet-sourced call girl was on the run.

Turns out having a head for technology doesn't preclude having a dark side. Hayes' demise is the focus of "Crisis of Death and the Google Exec," airing on CBS' 48 Hours on Saturday at 10 p.m. ET/PT.

"Hayes led a double life, but he's taking a lot of his secrets to his grave," says CBS reporter Marcia Maher, who filmed part of the show's segment about the executive's lavish 46-foot yacht Escape.

Maher notes that being aboard the floating crime scene provided insight into a man "who liked nice things," which included upgrading the captain's chair with an $8,000 replacement "and having this pool place outfitted with dozens of HD-quality cameras."

Those cameras ultimately captured the one-time automotive marketing exec turned Google employee's death after a night of partying with Alex Tichelman, 26, a tattooed, raven-haired, alleged call girl who advertised her for-pay companionship via a website called SeekingArrangement.com.

Tichelman is currently awaiting trial in Santa Cruz, Calif., where Hayes and his family lived. The double account of giving Hayes his final lethal dose of heroin and not calling for help when he became unresponsive.

Hayes' story intrigued Maher from the start. "Here's a guy who had everything, a wife, five children and a fantastic job. What could you possibly want outside of that?" she asks.

But Hayes is not at the bottom of Hayes' other, darker life. He proved difficult. "Not a single friend or family member would talk to me," Maher says. Maher says the segment features interviews with friends of Tichelman, whose alleged descent into the world of sex and drugs was punctuated by the heroin death of a former boyfriend in Atlanta. In that instance, she called 911 for help. "What really troubles prosecutors here is that she didn't call 911 when Hayes was clearly in trouble," says Maher, adding that Tichelman was later arrested on the boat (lying up for many minutes before leaving, all while her date was unconscious nearby).
