But more than any other day this season, Wednesday felt like the breaking point to acknowledge that what the NBA tried to pull off this year was a mistake if any part of its goal was to have enough healthy players to have a playoff worth caring about.

Of the eight teams that made the quarterfinals this season, seven will have to either overcome a serious injury to a key player in the playoffs or have a built-in excuse because of it. The eighth team, the Suns – who are resting comfortably awaiting the Western Conference finals – now have to deal with the uncertainty of Chris Paul reportedly entering COVID-19 health and safety protocols.

Some percentage of this is the cost of doing business. Injuries do happen, and they'll never be eliminated as a factor in any team's destiny.

But when you've got Kawhi Leonard sidelined with an ACL injury now, the Jazz uncertain when or if Mike Conley will be available due to a hamstring, Joel Embiid laboring on a torn meniscus for the 76ers, and the Nets having to do this with Kyrie Irving and James Harden going in and out of the lineup, there's a trend that can't be ignored. When the players who are carrying the biggest load night in and night out for these teams are struggling to stay healthy amid this crazy schedule, it doesn't feel like a coincidence.

To expand it out even further, eight different All-Stars have missed a playoff game this season, and that doesn't even account for the anterior cruciate ligament injury to Jamal Murray that basically ended Denver's chances of winning a title, De'Andre Hunter having meniscus surgery after Atlanta's first-round win over the Knicks or Donte DiVincenzo suffering a season-ending foot injury during Milwaukee's first-round series against Miami.

Superstar forward LeBron James played only 45 of the Lakers' 72 games this season. ASHLEY LANDIS/AP

This isn't normal, and it needs to spark some serious conversations within the league about the appropriate number of games in the season, playing back-to-backs, adding rest periods within the season, cutting down on travel, and much more. Everything should be on the table.

The hard part is that intelligent people in sports – and NBA executives are nothing if not intelligent – prefer that their decisions be driven by numbers. They don't want to make big changes in response to a small set of data points, and the NBA's publicly stated position has been that injuries were not worse this year versus past years.

But the eye test and common sense have to apply here, too. What the NBA schedule demanded of its players this season was insanity: lots of three-game in four night stretches, plenty of back-to-backs with travel in between, and precious few opportunities for teams to catch their breath or get healthy. Having star players break down right and left with soft tissue injuries, especially during the playoffs, was always a logical outcome of putting them through a condensed schedule.

Now it's reality.

Some will say that James' told-you-so critique of the way this season played out has echoes of sour grapes. He never quite got right after suffering a high ankle sprain on March 20, and the Lakers pretty much reached the end of the line when Anthony Davis went down with a groin injury in Game 4 against the Suns.

But his point about what the NBA's goals should be is worth taking seriously for next season and beyond. Without acknowledging the mistake of this schedule and the health of players being better taken into account in the future, this seems likely to happen again.

If these playoffs are ultimately little more than a test of attrition, so be it. Crown the worthy champion and move on. But trading a quality playoff product for regular season revenue is not a strategy that will do anything for the NBA's appeal over the long term.

With this latest batch of injuries, perhaps the league will finally acknowledge that something needs to be fixed.

MLB

who is in his 13th season and says MLB's foreign substance crackdown "is not going to affect me at all.

"I don't think it's, 'OK, this guy's spin rate's down, his slider's not as good, his fastball's not jumping as much, so it must be sticky.' The way things are these days, people will jump to conclusions. But it's not always the right one."

MLB's announcement Tuesday that beginning Monday it will instruct umpires to vigorously enforce rules against foreign substance use comes after years of players pushing the rulebook too far, leaping from the gentlemanly and accepted use of pine tar to more complex and impactful products like Spider Tack, stuff that crosses the line from control aid to performance enhancer.

And so, not unlike the great awakening on steroid use at the turn of this century, the hunt is on.

Who's been gooping up?

And who's going to get shelled when they stop?

This will be an inquisition unlike any we've seen.

When batters and pitchers alike juiced up with steroids, growth hormones and other PEDs for much of the 1990s and 2000s, the lone evidence was in physical changes to a player or a spike in their slugging percentage or strikeout rates. In the absence of drug testing, which did not begin until 2003, some players were so blatant in their usage that fans could reasonably intuit something was amiss based on performance.

Meanwhile, dozens of others skated past the suspicion and even received a lifetime immunity of sorts if they were not entangled in the Mitchell Report,

MLB's enforcement crackdown will begin Monday. JAE C. HONG/AP

MLB's 2007 investigation into PED use that implicated nearly 100 players yet was far from an exhaustive accounting of PED use.

Now, in the great sticky crackdown of 2021?

Observers need only point their browsers to a player's statistical performance and his spin rate data, easily accessible on Baseball Savant, an advanced-metrics website now under MLB's umbrella.

Was Bieber's poor performance injury related or because he swore off foreign substances? Is a 12% drop in spin on his curveball from an early April start to a June 3 start – two days after MLB informed owners a crackdown was coming – due to substance cessation or any of the dozens of factors, including health, that affect pitching performance?

With umpires authorized to shake down pitchers multiple times a game, those caught red-handed – or on their belt, glove, cap, shoes, whatever – will be nailed in plain sight and suspended.

Those who suddenly regress, with either their spin rate plummeting or their ERA soaring, may find themselves indicted in the court of public opinion without physical evidence.

"In the steroid era, if someone was good, it was automatically, 'He's on steroids,'" Red Sox reliever Matt Barnes said after Boston's previously solid pitching staff was pounded for 53 runs over six games last week. "The easiest way to justify someone being bad or good over a stretch is something other than what it really is. It's just the easiest way to talk about it. That's what happens when you play 162 games. There's too many games to stay at an elite level for every single one of them.

"(Foreign substances) just seems like an easy way out."

Indeed, a Boston Globe analysis of Red Sox pitchers revealed no substantial drop in pitcher spin rate during their staffwide slump, which also came in the days following the news of the impending crackdown.

The cat-and-mouse game between players and the game's enforcement wing will now be enhanced – the cat, in this case, umpires, will be ordered to check pitchers multiple times a game. Balls and, if necessary, equipment will be collected as evidence. Yet rooting out all foreign substance use is virtually impossible – particularly if pitchers inspected and found to be clean are emboldened.

"You're not supposed to break the speed limit, too. But you do. You know what I'm saying?" says Astros manager Dusty Baker.

Meanwhile, much of the rhetoric from the steroids era has returned, with players and executives either claiming/feigning ignorance or welcoming scrutiny, taking Detwiler's tack that they have nothing to hide. Yankees GM Brian Cashman said Tuesday that he'd "never heard of Spider Tack until three weeks ago. Honest to God."

That would put him at odds with the dozens of players who have either used it or experimented with it or chatted about it in long walks to the outfield to shag fly balls or the many hours of dead time spent with comrades in the bullpen.

Many will be fighting a public perception battle wrought by one of their peers. Dodgers starter Trevor Bauer claimed in 2020 that upward of 70% of pitchers use foreign substances. In 2018, he essentially confirmed he experimented with a pine tar mixture during the first inning of one start, if only to illustrate how that one-inning spike in spin rate proved the efficacy of foreign substances.

And after perhaps joining them instead of trying to beat them, his spin rates soared as he won the 2020 National League Cy Young Award, and then dipped in recent weeks.

Perhaps he laid off the stuff. Perhaps he'll turn back into a league average-ish pitcher post-crackdown, albeit after securing $102 million over three years from the Dodgers.

And perhaps only the tincture of time can tell us the whole story – eager though we might be to scamper online, calculate a dip in spin rate and convict the guilty party.

"I think false correlations are made every single day," says Brewers manager Craig Counsell. "Every player in there deals with a false correlation nearly every day he plays the game. It's part of being a professional athlete, especially the world these athletes live in with social media.

"I don't think it'll be that obvious. I think there's going to be adjustment periods and then it will all go back to normal. Good players are going to be good players."
