If there's baseball in 2020, 'there will be no asterisk' for champion

Bob Nightengale
Columnist
USA TODAY

Major League Baseball managers, buoyed by a belief there will be games played this year, acknowledge the season will be like no other.

There will be fewer games. New rivals. New divisions. New rules. New playoff format. And likely no fans.

In the end, though, there will be a new World Series champion.

And no matter what anyone says, managers believe that winning the World Series would be just as gratifying, perhaps even more so, than any other title.

"There will be no asterisk," Los Angeles Dodgers manager Dave Roberts told USA TODAY. "When you look at all of the hurdles, keeping your team together emotionally, and what your players have to do differently to prepare for this season, you can argue it would mean more than going through the duration and grind of an eight-month season."

"To get to the finish line, and be the last team standing holding that trophy, and knowing what you had to go through to get there, would be as satisfying as any World Series championship."

Houston Astros manager Dusty Baker was on the Dodgers team that won the 1981 World Series. It was a split-season with a 50-day players' strike. Teams didn't play the same amount of games. The St. Louis Cardinals, who had the best overall record, didn't even make the playoffs. There was an extra round of playoffs before the league championship series.

And not a single player, Baker said, felt as if the title were tainted.

"I still think about how special that feeling was," Baker said. "I never forgot it. And it would be no different now."

"It doesn't matter how the season will look; everybody is going to be running the same race. And winning the World Series is going to feel like no other. Imagine the storybook ending on this season."

"This is America's game. It goes on for eight months a year. It will be different without the electricity of fans in the stands, but it's baseball."

The Atlanta Braves won their only World Series in 1995, the same year that the work stoppage delayed the start of the season. Teams played 144 games instead of 162.

Try telling the Braves their accomplishment felt any different.

"It will be a different year obviously," Braves manager Brian Snitker said. "But regardless of how many games we play, and what you did to get there, I think it will be special."

The San Francisco Giants won three World Series championships in five years, each one unique, and if it happens again this year, the emotions will be feel completely different.

And, yes, that trophy will be sitting prominently in their gorgeous ballpark, right alongside the others.

"I definitely don't think it would mean any less," Giants manager Gabe Kapler said. "I think there could be something really powerful about winning a championship in any sport at a time where everyone is really coming together, appreciating the healing role sports play in society.

"What we're facing is something larger than any of us, and experiencing that moment of unity as a team under the circumstances, could be even more emotional."

Says St. Louis Cardinals manager Mike Shildt, who jokes that he has set a world record for the longest honeymoon after being married on March 6: "Being able to win this year's World Series, regardless of the circumstances, you're still having the most elite players in the world compete for one title. And regardless of what that formula looks like, the magnitude would still be equal of a whole season."

"That ring will be more than earned."

If there weren't a trophy to be won, or it didn't matter whether you won or lost, why bother coming back to play? It's the competition that has driven the players to reach the major leagues, and if anything, a shorter season may fuel that drive.

The mantra of, it's not a sprint, it's a marathon, will not exist if the season is played in 2020.

"We always talk about every game being meaningful in the rugged NL West," Arizona Diamondbacks manager Torey Lovullo says, "but a losing streak of seven to eight games can sock it to you."

This is the first time there has been optimism that there will even be a season since the pandemic shut down the sports world last month. It doesn't matter if the leagues will be realigned, or if the season becomes more like baseball's version of March Madness.

"Who cares, if we're playing, who really cares what the changes are," Snitker says. "I just want to play. I'm willing to do whatever they decided to do, make it work, and be really good. When we start playing again, it will be good for our country."

"I don't think anybody will be (complaining) again about the length of the Red Sox-Yankee games anymore."

Who's going to complain about the time of any games? The rash of strikeouts? The walks? Even bat-flips?

This is a country starved for sports, pleading for normalcy, and baseball hopes to be the one to provide that relief.

"It's not apples to apples, but look what baseball did for our country after 9/11" Roberts said. "Baseball can provide a semblance of a sign of things to come, a sign of hope, and getting America's pastime in people's homes."

"You look at this pandemic, and you see what this has done to our entire world and country, the economy, and jobs and unemployment. The morale of the country has been greatly affected. Sports can unify this country, and to come back is going to be pretty emotional."

Who knows, after this season, maybe we'll never look at baseball again the same.

And maybe that's a blessing. "I think the country needs it, man," Baker said. "There's a greater appreciation of what we had than what we lost, and hopefully, we can get it back."

"When you see people dying, the food lines, and what people don't have, man, if that doesn't make you have a greater appreciation for life, nothing will."

Ramirez, 47, wants comeback

Chris Bumbaca
USA TODAY

Major League Baseball may be on the road to a possible return. Manny Ramirez hopes it's the same for him, although he realizes that at his age, he won't be suiting up in the big leagues.

The former Cleveland Indians and Boston Red Sox slugger told the Taiwan Times on Wednesday that his goal for 2020 is to return to Taiwan's Chinese Professional Baseball League.

"I have been itching to get back in the batter's box and be able to compete again," he told the Times. "I also miss being around teammates and team dinners post-game."

"I know if I was given the opportunity to come in an organization as a player-coach, it would do great things for the organization and the league."

It's not the first time Ramirez is attempting a comeback overseas. In 2013, he hit .352/.422/.555 for the EDA Rhinos, one of the league's five teams (that has since taken a different name under new ownership), in 49 games. Ramirez clubbed eight homers and drove in 43 runs.

Ramirez, however, will turn 48 next month. He told the paper he will provide positive contributions in a player-coach role, not unlike the duties he performed in the Chicago Cubs organization in 2014. He dropped the player tag after one season but remained an instructor, before attempting a comeback in Japan in 2017.

Ramirez said he considered playing in the independent Atlantic League stateside, but prefers the CPBL.

"I am still confident in my ability to serve as a player-coach and provide positive contributions to any ball club that is willing to have me on their staff/roster," he told the Times.

"I have been working out daily and keeping my mind at ease, with only one thing in mind - how to get back on the field."

Taken by the Indians in the first round of the 1991 draft, Ramirez made 12 All-Star squads throughout his career and won two World Series with the Red Sox. He hit 555 home runs and left MLB with 555 home runs and a .996 OPS.

Whether Ramirez can add to the legend of "Manny being Manny" remains to be seen.

Manny Ramirez says he is still "itching" to play baseball.
